> GEN, SHERMAN must have felt that e was in an odd situation at Atlanta he other day. He had returned to he city he shelled out and burned seventeen years ago In place of frightened women and children, old men, sick, wounded and dead soldiers in the midst of blackened ruins and all the evidences of devastating war, he found a flourishing city full of life and activity, with fine hotels, stately blocks of business houses, wide streets and sidewalks teeming with happy people, all intent on business or pleasure. Had he been taken there blindfolded, and not told where he was, he might have gone around for hours without recognizing the place. Save a few landmarks there is nothing left of the old Atlanta. A complete transformation has taken place. The old soldier of either side who goes back low, for the first time since the war sees little to recall that period. Gen. Sherman's idea was that war was a terrible business. That it meant death and destruction while it lasted, and it cannot be denied that he carried out his theory with sufficient rigor.
